Atmospheric pressure photoionization (APPI) mass spectrometry (MS) was used as a detector for headspace analysis. The developed analytical method was tested on the analysis of ethyl palmitate (ethyl oleate), ethyl palmitoleate (ethyl linoleate) and ethyl stearate (ethyl ester of stearic acid). The method was validated by analyzing the spiked ethyl ester standards in several tea and vinegar samples. The method was satisfactorily applied to the analysis of ethyl esters in tea, vinegar and margarine samples. The method was applied to the identification of ethyl esters in synthetic cream samples. Ethyl palmitate was found to be the most abundant ethyl ester in the spiked cream samples whereas ethyl linoleate was the most abundant in tea, margarine and natural cream.Q: How to detect if an app is running for more than 2 minutes? I am writing an app where once you start to play certain games it runs in the background without you knowing. In order to do this, I have to check if the app is still running after 2 minutes. I currently set a handler to check the status of the app every second. If there is a way to detect if the app is still running after the handler exits, I would greatly appreciate it. A: After you start the application, just save a TimerTask TimerTask task = new TimerTask() { @Override public void run() { // Check your application's state } }; task.schedule(2000); Then, on main activity set the following handler Handler handler = new Handler(); // check the application's state runOnUiThread(new

Ask HN: How do you add comments with emoji to a project in GitHub? - emik000 I have seen some programmers post code snippets with emoji. I don't know how one uses them. How do you post code snippets with emoji in GitHub or any other git repository? ====== notahacker If emoji are not supported, Emoji boxes are probably the next best thing. They look like regular code boxes and the only two thing I'm aware of that aren't supported on GitHub are footnote marks. Center The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA) Center for Weather and Climate Prediction (CWCP;) is a government agency of the United States' National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration located in Silver Spring, Maryland, United States. It is responsible for the watch, warning and forecast services provided to the public to assist in the planning of personal and business activities. The Center is the world's second largest and most expansive oceanic and atmospheric weather agency. Operations NOAA's Weather Bureau (NOA) was moved to Wright-Patterson Air Force Base in Ohio in the 1950s. The agency was renamed the National Centers for Environmental Prediction (NCEP) in 1965, and was accredited to the Icing Sensor Evaluation Program run by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) in Houston, Texas. These programs were the predecessor to the present-day center. It covered the west coast, as well as the Pacific and Atlantic oceans. Prior to a renaming by Congress in 1958, it was known as the National Bureau of Ice and Fog Service; "Ice and Fog Service" was an acronym for the ice assessment programme until the year 2007. Ice and fog were two geographical areas in which weather forecasting tools could be used to predict the effects of sea ice conditions in the Great Lakes and other such bodies of water. The Weather Bureau (NOA) was later replaced by the Advanced Weather Interactive Processing System (AWIPS), produced by the National Weather Service's National Operations Center (NOC). A series of NOAA-borne radar systems, such as the Trimble Weather ServicE System, has further led to the increased automation and accessibility of weather information. In a charter dated January 6, 1946, the forerunner to NOAA was founded as the National Advisory Oceanic and Meteorological Laboratory (NAOMI), with an organizational structure similar to a typical four-year university. NAOMI was relatively small throughout its existence, and only had a few hundred employees. Later, it was renamed the National Climatic Data Center, and then Oceanic and Atmospheric Research, before settling on its current name. Congress passed the Weather Disaster Reduction Act (WDRA) in 1988 on October 2, 1988 and the National Weather Service Organization Act (NWSOA) in 1990. This was the legal instate that provided for executive control over NOAA's operations, and provided for the transfer of the El Paso Rain gauge and facilities. In August 1994, the Weather Portability Act was
