To examine the prevalence and predictors of diabetic retinopathy in a rural Chinese population. A population-based cross-sectional study in a sample of rural adults (nonfasting blood glucose level >11.1 mmol/l) aged 40-80 years was carried out in a rural community of Shanghai. The study included 2525 people. Diabetic retinopathy prevalence was 0.8%, and it was higher in those with shorter ($p = 0.025$) and with older ($p = 0.005$) duration of diabetes. Diabetic retinopathy was independently associated with microalbuminuria (OR = 2.14, 95%CI: 1.06-4.31) and microalbuminuria plus hypertension (OR = 2.47, 95%CI: 1.32-4.66) in the multivariate analysis. Other diabetes microvascular complications were not associated with diabetic retinopathy. Microalbuminuria and hypertension, either alone or in combination, were predictors of diabetic retinopathy in a rural population of China.. Our distribution curve is rising, and it has been for some time. Some of this is due to the increasing numbers of patent grantees, as of which there were 12,000 issued in 1992. But it also reflects the increasing sophistication and knowledge of patent law by the patent-purchasers. They are increasingly using the full gamut of procedural tools and acquiring a better appreciation of the value of these tools. While the royalty rate may not be variable, the outcomes of litigation are certainly not., Zembrzycki, [An algorithm for computing the automorphism group of regular polyhedra]{} , Discrete and Computational Geometry 40 (2008), no. 1, 1-11. Telephone call answering systems are used to allow a party calling a telephone number to reach a selected extension of an answering machine connected to the telephone network. The answering machine can play a message to a caller, wait for the caller to depress a particular key or keys to cause a verbal response, and then record the caller's message. This information can then be retrieved by a called party. Many answering machines have a built-in speaker for amplifying the voice information of the answering machine. In addition, an answering machine may record a caller's message automatically. This is done by first detecting when the answering machine has received an incoming call, and then recording the caller's message on the answering machine. A disadvantage of known telephone call answering systems is that the automatic recording of the caller's message requires an uninterruptible power supply (UPS). Typically, this is achieved by connecting the answering machine to a battery charger circuit. If the UPS fails or runs out of power, the answering machine may be unable to record a caller's message because the battery charger circuit has failed. An additional disadvantage of known telephone call answering systems is that it is impossible to detect whether the telephone line is connected to a called party. In addition, many telephone service providers charge a reduced rate if a call is connected to an answering machine, rather than to a telephone set. If a caller calls a telephone number in a private residence, the caller may be charged a rate that is less than the normal rate that a caller would be charged if a call had been placed to an ordinary telephone set. Furthermore, if a call is connected to an answering machine when the party receiving the call is not at home, it is unlikely that the person answering the call is aware that the call is being connected to the answering machine and that the party who called is not at home. A further disadvantage of known telephone answering systems is that they are incapable of monitoring a telephone line for the presence of its called party. An answering machine receives a call from a caller and a message is recorded. When the called party calls back, the answering machine should automatically suspend recording the call so that the called party may record her own message to the caller. However, the caller may attempt to determine when the called party will be available to record a
