What's new:

She was quiet and I could feel his heated gaze on my face. I met his deep blue eyes and slowly tilted my head up. I could see the nervousness behind his gaze, the same as mine, the same as he had the night we met. "Yara, I love you." He exclaimed. "I've never told anyone that before." I woke up the next morning to a fine drizzle and lightning in the distance. Bryce was sitting a few feet away from me, smoking a small cigarillo and sipping his coffee. I got up and brushed the sleeping sack and slipped on some clothes. I looked down at the cloths strewn around me and smiled. It was going to be a memorable trip for both of us. The rain was coming down harder, and I got back in the Bronco. We drove through the rain and slicked roads to downtown Medford and the Riverfront area. Bryce found a small campground just before the Crown of Leaves Trail and we spent the night there. He was feeding me the most delicious Italian food I had ever had. So good I forgot for
