Mindfulness awareness training may improve treatment outcomes for people with chronic obstructive pulmonary disease, according to a randomized, controlled trial of 105 hospitalized patients at Massachusetts General Hospital. The training, which is available in the Boston area, includes techniques designed to bring awareness to pain, stress, or other physical and emotional reactions. Patients who tried the program tended to show greater psychological flexibility and less emotion-driven health-care avoidance when meeting with health care providers, researchers report. "Our results show that mindfulness training can be an effective intervention to support the important process of psychological flexibility," says study author Lisa M. King, MD, professor of medicine at Massachusetts General Hospital. Mindfulness and Acceptance In the training, patients learn to observe the contents of their mind and body in a nonjudgmental fashion, rather than letting thoughts and feelings overwhelm them, King says. "Mindfulness helps us gain perspective on what is going on inside of us without focusing so intensely on 'the problem,'" she explains. advertisement "When you can do that, you gain more control over what happens in your life," King says. COPD is a common chronic respiratory disease characterized by airway obstruction and inflammation. Studies suggest that COPD patients also experience physical and psychosocial limitations, including a diminished sense of well-being, emotional difficulties, and fear of getting sick, King says. Previous research has shown that patients with COPD generally suffer from high levels of psychological distress and avoid seeking medical care, creating an opportunity for healthcare providers to address any unmet needs.
